Sustainable Craftsmanship

At a time when the fashion industry faces growing scrutiny over its environmental and social impact, a proposal emerges that reclaims what is handmade, local, and conscious. The user's brand — dedicated to sustainable artisanal fashion — has become a quiet yet steadfast reference within this movement. Their work with wool and handcrafted felt not only preserves traditional techniques but also proves that fashion can be beautiful, functional, and respectful of the planet.

Each piece is born from a slow, almost ritualistic process in which the raw material is treated with the respect that a natural fiber deserves. The wool, carefully selected, undergoes a transformation in which the human hand plays an irreplaceable role: shaping, joining, felting, bringing it to life. This is not mass production; it is an exercise in patience and mastery that turns every creation into a unique object.

The use of handcrafted felt is a statement of intent. In contrast to the immediacy of fast fashion, felt requires time, water, movement, and sensitivity. Its versatility allows the creation of pieces with organic textures and a warm aesthetic that reconnects with what the industry has forgotten: the intimate relationship between creator, material, and wearer.

But the value of this work lies not only in technique. The project embraces a vision of sustainable fashion that understands responsibility as a central pillar: small-scale production, natural materials, low-impact processes, and a constant commitment to durability.

In a market saturated with fleeting trends, this project advocates for another way of dressing — one that tells stories, preserves the trace of the artisan's hand, and invites us to appreciate the beauty of the imperfect, the authentic, and the purposefully made.

La Laguna

The city of La Laguna, just minutes from the port, was declared a World Heritage Site by UNESCO in 1999 as a “unique example of an unfortified colonial city.” After its founding, its urban layout served as a model for other colonial cities in the Americas, such as Old Havana, Lima, and Cartagena de Indias; it shares aesthetic similarities with them. Today, the historic center, with its pedestrian streets that invite leisurely strolls, boasts a lively and comprehensive array of shops and, especially, high-quality restaurants.

Christmas Time

The city of La Laguna at Christmas is a place where locals and tourists stroll through its illuminated streets. In the Plaza de la Concepción, where the tower of the Church of the Immaculate Conception stands (first photo), you can find stalls selling roasted chestnuts, so hot and delicious that they will enhance your walk through the most emblematic corners of the city center while you enjoy them. The distances are short and it is very easy to explore its streets and squares, which feature a remarkable number of churches and historic buildings, many of them open to visitors.

Diane Keaton

BEE(S) . . . POWERFUL

Diane Keaton became a global star in 1977, starring in Annie Hall, a role that won her her first Oscar (she'd win four in total), along with a BAFTA and a Golden Globe. Her character's style closely mirrored her own, with many of the clothes being hers. Keaton embraced oversized menswear, vests, clown shoes, and "ugly" ties —pieces that weren't typical for chic women at the time. Vintage clothing was usually reserved for rockers and bohemians, but she made it her own, turning it into a trend.

She passed away this year at 79, leaving behind a legacy of style that continues to inspire.
